The action took place on 11 November 1900 near the town of Kroonstad, situated on the banks of the Komati River, about from the border with the Cape Colony. The battle was a decisive victory for the South African Native Labour Corps, and marked the conclusion of the Roos Senekal Campaign, which had been launched by a group of guerrilla fighters led by Lieutenant Colonel Frederick Cloete to disrupt Boer commando operations along the border. Background During the Second Boer War, the South African Native Labour Corps (SANLC), a paramilitary force of mohawk-wearing South African blacks and black Britons recruited largely from the Xhosa and Zulu tribes, were used as irregular shock troops in a series of guerrilla actions against the Boer commandos. The SANLC force under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Frederick Cloete had made an unannounced raid against a Boer commando at the Tweefontein kopjes on 29 November 1899, capturing two individuals, including Boer commander Andries Erasmus. A similar operation by Cloete's men at the same location on 11 December 1899 resulted in the death of 11 Boer commandos and a casualty rate of 25 percent. Cloete then organised further raids, including an attack on Boer forces in December 1900. These operations by the SANLC occurred in the region between the South African border with the Cape Colony and the Orange River. The leader of the SANLC forces was Cloete, who was also a South
