Hepatitis C virus: subgenomic fragments containing essential structural genes. The genomic sequences of six hepatitis C virus (HCV) isolates, each with a different genotype, were analysed by preparing a cDNA library of HCV RNA and PCR amplification of all possible cDNAs. The amplified fragments were ligated into the eukaryotic expression vector pSP64, transcribed in vitro and hybridized in situ with labeled riboprobes specific for each of the six HCV genotypes. Analysis of the results indicated that a common region of about 600 nucleotides (nt) is present in each of the subgenomic RNA species corresponding to the essential structural genes, and that this region is highly conserved among all six genotypes. The nucleotide sequences of the "essential region" of each virus isolate were related to that of the genotype 1b isolate, Nakayama, for which a model of the three dimensional structure of the HCV proteins has already been reported. Thus, the "essential region" of the six genotypes, and even of the genotype 1b isolate, shared almost complete conservation of nucleotide sequence. Although the sequence of this region was not as highly conserved among the non 3da54e8ca3
