Atrial-angiotensin-aldosterone axis and cardiovascular responses to mental stress in humans. In normal subjects, hemodynamic responses to mental stress are greater in the presence of aldosterone deficiency. We tested whether this is seen in angiotensin II-mediated situations, where the dependence on aldosterone differs from that seen with non-angiotensin II-mediated situations. The supine position is a non-angiotensin II-mediated stress and was compared with the upright position, with a similar duration, during which mental stress was only mediated by angiotensin II. Among 14 normal subjects, the supine position induced a transient increase in blood pressure, heart rate and cardiac output (Q), while the upright position induced the opposite. Plasma angiotensin II increased and aldosterone decreased in the supine position and decreased in the upright position. Overall, the hemodynamic responses in the supine position tended to be greater than in the upright position (systolic blood pressure, 20.9 +/- 1.5 vs 13.0 +/- 1.1 mmH
