Coachella-goers, if you want to experience the most extreme, extreme music festival in the world, get your ticket pronto! In just the last few days the lineup was announced for this year's version of the underground music extravaganza, and it's clear it's not going to be one many took lightly. At least 25 bands are performing on the main stage, including Yeah Yeah Yeahs, Frank Ocean, The Black Keys, The Black Lips, My Morning Jacket, and more. On Friday, the old-school rockers Black Sabbath kicked off the second day of Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival at Indio's Empire Polo Club. The hardest rock band in the world will undoubtedly be the headlining act over the weekend, with six performances in all. "Musically, this festival is very hard to describe," said Black Sabbath in a statement. "The music is very different to the others, and we have done it our own way. The performances are not to be missed, especially on the final day. This is true heavy metal." It seems the first day of Coachella will be more under the radar, with many on-hand fans saying it's not like any other festival out there. "I definitely think it's gonna be a more underground/indie experience," said

Patrick Callahan, a student at UC Irvine. “The reason being, the band we’ll be watching is Black Sabbath. I’ve never seen them before, but from the pictures and the reviews I read, it seems like a very heavy kind of show.” Craig Thompson, a construction supervisor at the Empire Polo Club, agrees that the

What's new:

A concept that seems to be the darling of current VFX trends is the so called “Scanning Frustum Sub-Pixel Rendering”, what is known as Scanline Sub-Pixel Rendering. The idea behind this, simply put, is that you are not rendering the final image, but calculate it on the fly, as you render. The cool thing is that since the data only depends on a few projection planes, very few “pixel”-points are actually required. A lot of work has been done with various aspects, however I am going to focus on why this is an interesting concept for compositing, albeit with numerous disadvantages compared to regular Sub-Pixel Rendering. ScanLine Sub-Pixel Rendering on several planes / renderings This animation shows how to render infinite angles, although realistically you should only do a render for a small, maybe 10 degrees worth of the whole sphere. You will see, that the actual rendering is not quite smooth, but this is impossible to achieve with this technique. There is also a frame rate drop, as you can actually cause the rendering to only compute the lines that are visible, which of course also leads to less work to be done. The reasons for most of this is that most virtual cameras, and real-world conditions do not actually have these projection planes perfectly lined up, which results in de-focusing and aliasing effects, which you will see later. The Basics The idea here is that we will just render into a depth buffer, nothing more than that. The idea here is that because of the SLSR technique, we have a look-up-table with every possible depth. So if I calculate the depth for each “point” as it advances, I find which depth I get, and then jump into my lookup-table. Let’s dive in: Imagine that I want to render infinite points. Let’s say I start at, and just render points until I compute an infinite render, which for example would be at. By doing so I render the points for which, and an infinite number of points for which. Now imagine I divide the world into slices. So each level is a slice, which is a little bit further than the previous level. I can split my world into levels, and then render each level on it’s own, by rendering each slice. The render for level 3 of 3 of our example. First
