// end metadatadirs If anyone can point out the proper syntax for this command, that would be most helpful. A: I figured it out, finally. The command should be: $playername_change_name $character_name $Name In this case, "Name" is a capitalized, lowercase word containing the characters [a-zA-Z0-9] and no spaces. The syntax for such a string should be UTF-8 encoding. Q: Hdfs native Path traversal If a node in hdfs has a directory like /abc/def/ghz, can i get each and every files present under that directory by their name using path traversal? Eg: if its a dir, instead of /abc/def/ghz, can i have it as /abc//def/ghz/? Is there a way to get the files present under that dir? A: A simple solution for this is to use jshell's dir() and list() commands. List will show files under abc as "/abc/def

3 FEATURES AVAILABLE ON ALL PLATFORMS...Q: Why do the shared mv is usually small? Most linux/unix platforms allow several users to share a single directory. For example, it is possible to share a directory for foobar, foobar2, foobar3, etc. Then the owner of the directory is shared. However, the permissions usually only allow foobar and foobar2 to list or read the contents of the directory. My question is, why is the ownership almost always set to foobar and foobar2? I'm aware that the permissions already restrict the shared directory access to the owner foobar only, so why is the ownership also set to the same foobar only? Using a test directory on a virtual machine, I found the ownership to be: > ls -al drwxr-xr-x 5 root root dir 4096 Oct 3 15:40 test The directory has foobar and foobar2 as owner and group, which makes sense. However, the permissions list the owner foobar and the group foobar, so why isn't the owner still foobar and the group foobar? After changing the ownership to be foobar:foobar, everything is fine, the owner is foobar and the group is foobar; with the same permissions. A: This is the consequence of the Linux file ownership mechanism; /etc/passwd comes with a default set of accounts and groups and defines which account should be associated with which permissions. This is simplified a little. In a directory hierarchy, you have a root account called root. This account is associated with permissions to everything in the directory hierarchy; in /usr, root owns /usr/bin, for example. You then have a set of users who inherit their permissions and ownership from that of their parents. In /usr/bin, for example, there are init
